Targeted

For this project, I worked on a brief by Graphic Matters, translating a ocial issue into a strong visual concept. I wanted the final result to immediately grab attention while still communicating the seriousness of the subject.

I developed the concept, visual direction and overall art direction myself. I was responsible for directing the photoshoot, including the styling, composition, poses and visual atmosphere. I really enjoyed taking on this directing role, as it allowed me to bring the concept to life and make creative decisions throughout the entire process.

For the visual style, I chose a dark, high-contrast aesthetic inspired by vintage horror movie posters. By combining black, white and deep red with a distressed texture, I created an unsettling atmosphere that supports the message of the campaign. The contrast between the glamorous imagery and the disturbing subject was intentional: it makes the viewer look twice and challenges the idea of violence as something distant or fictional.
This project taught me how much I enjoy working on the creative direction and production side of a project, especially turning an initial idea into a complete visual concept.
